Jesus' Core Being, His People and the Interest of Four of Them in the Earth

Jesus

April 21, 1998

I am, as you say, the core personality of that being known on this Earth as Jesus. I'd like to talk initially a little bit about who I really am and where I'm from and what I do. We'll expand on all of this later on in the book.

From Binary to Individual Beings

I was first aware, cognizant of myself as a binary being, a dual being, you might say. Not exactly like a Siamese twin, as you have in the physical, but to keep it simple, if you were to take two gingerbread men (or women) cookies and superimpose one over the other—not directly over, but slightly offset—that's how I used to be. That's how most of the people where I live used to be.

In recent times (to me, recent times are measured in billions of experiential years), we started moving and we were, as you would now perceive us, individuals. Our council is made up of everyone in this place where I live. Although not everybody comments all the time, we're all on the council; we don't have representatives. Our council had no explanation for this quite radical change in our demonstrated selves. We had always been dual, and it was quite strange to find oneself becoming singular.

The transition to singularity, or what you would perceive as individuality, took awhile—in terms of experiential years, perhaps a billion years. Yet, as we are immortals, that’s not so very long. It happened slowly enough that we could realize something was happening, but not so fast that we would be traumatized by it. When some of us started becoming actual individuals, there was a considerable discussion over the idea. Was something wrong? Had something artificial stimulated this? The consensus at that time was that there was nothing artificial, that it was normal and to be expected.

Now, as the process went on and more and more of our people became individuals, we were very curious about the process. At first we considered it a phenomenon, then gradually, as individual personalities, we realized that we were, in fact, still intact on the personality level. We hadn’t lost anything when our duality, our other self, split off. Each became the totality of our former selves. It wasn’t the kind of separation you experience as man and woman; it was more of a completed duplication (one might say that), although we had always been this dual kind of being.

As we considered what this was suggesting, the consensus developed that this was the process of creating individuality from something else. Thus our society, which had been largely set up to accommodate dual beings, had to make quite significant changes to accommodate individual beings, which we had all become. We considered that for some time, then decided that this was not an accident. We were not conscious, of course, of anybody stimulating it, but it was not an accident and it meant something.

When we were going through these different changes, where a society built up in every way for dual beings suddenly had to accommodate singular beings, we felt, as a result of our experience, that it was positive, that nothing had been lost and that to some extent something had been gained. So we decided that if other societies wished to experience it, this would be a good system.

Individuality: Threads of Potential

Since it is our job (what we do here) to create threads of potential, I’ll call them, and release them in all directions to be utilized by creators and/or enlightened individuals anywhere, we felt that we would release the threads of individuality, which we did. Then we felt that there was more to it; perhaps it ought to be coded with individuality as a growth system. We released that.

Then others said, “What about individuality as a growth system that includes all beings?” We had to consider that for a while and discuss it. Many of our people wanted to know if there should be any limits on all beings or whether it should be open—inclusive of all beings everywhere, including beings we weren't aware of. We decided that if the codification was built in and released in all directions so that it would have to be a benevolent experience (if not immediately, at least ultimately), it would be all right. That was the thread of the Explorer Race.

The Growth-Based Universe

I might add that from what I have seen, some aspects—not the totality in terms of what you've heard—of the Explorer Race are taking place in other mass creations. For instance, in one universe I know of, a creator is establishing the universe for beings who are exclusively interested in growth, not really anything else. As far as I can tell, this universe is based largely on the thread we sent out, since the universe will be peopled with individuals. Most likely at some point when the Explorer Race (as discussed in previous volumes) becomes a creator on its own and eventually moves up in dimensions after creating a replacement, one of the first places you will go is to this universe having to do with growth. As a creator, you are going to have a very high priority and good feeling about growth because of your ultimate purpose. And when you visit this universe, as a creator, you will probably discover many other ways for growth.

This is likely to become, then, a very meaningful place for you. When you begin to create your own universe, not just take over this one, you will utilize your accumulated experiences here, and half the motivation behind your new creation will be from your visit to the place that is exclusively growth-oriented. In my understanding, then, you might say (although it is not totally accurate) that the creator involved in this growth universe is really laying out the foundation—the welcome mat, if you would—for you to be able to find it easily. Because that universe is growth and you will be growth, in the larger sense your future agenda is actually being laid out by what this creator is doing.

I wanted to mention that to you so that you could see that the threads we create here ultimately have a purpose and intent even though we do not make them so structured. Rather, we send them out, not unlike you might send out a loose idea or a possible suggestion to others.

In Becoming Individuals, We Discovered Friends

When I became my individual self, I began to understand something that you all, on your planet where you are now, understand very well: As a dual being connected to all other dual beings on our place of existence, I felt a total sense of family with all of our fellow beings. With a
